EDUCATION/TRAINING

Police and detective applicants must have at least a high school diploma or equivalent, although some federal agencies and police departments may require that applicants have completed college coursework or a college degree. Many community colleges and four-year colleges and universities offer programs in law enforcement and criminal justice.

Candidates for law enforcement appointments usually attend a training academy before becoming an officer. Training includes classroom instruction in state and local laws and constitutional law, civil rights, and police ethics. Recruits also receive training and supervised experience in subjects such as patrol, traffic control, firearm use, self-defense, first aid, and emergency response.

IMPORTANT SKILLS

- Communication skills to speak with people and to communicate details in writing about an incident
- Empathy to understand people in their community
- Good judgment to determine the best way to solve problems
- Leadership skills to help in emergencies
- Perceptiveness to anticipate people's reactions and understand why they act a particular way
- Physical stamina to pass required tests for entry into the field and to do the job
- Physical strength to physically apprehend suspects and to assist people in dangerous situations
- Physical fitness to pass tests to enter the field and keep up with demands of the job
